would they not be recogn'sed on nd they are spotted with gore, -and who didn't consume them in the first place, but I thought then I might need them; though be that as it may, I'd do the business this night!"

The cleck struck twe've, as Nelson Bradford, at without inward beeftancy stole from the se and bastened rapidly along by the side of did not pause, but hurried through the door ato one of the lower spartments, where he hted the dark lantern he carried, and, gazing fearfully, tremblingly around, crept softly up the creeking stairs to the room on the second he pushed open the door, and peared in to atisfy himself that it was unoccupied; at every ound he wou'd s art wi h terror, for he was in

Trees and si'us i'm for one so guilty as be. Once the stutter swung against the house with the wind, his k ees smote against each other. is eyes started, and his face blanched with error, but i subsid d a little when he found he was unmo'ested.

Shivering like an aspen lea', he set the lanters upon the ground, and approaching the martel, decorated -ih the ingentous drapery of the spider, and bick with dast, sought for the spring the see et panel. Terribed as he was, he would ave been incapable of motion, could be have en the figure near the en rance of the apartment, rho was a ching every movement, but the gloom hid the sight; at last yielding to his vigorous efforts the panel flew open, revealing the fittle compartment with its single shelf, he looked in perceived with conster ation, that it was empty! Had a thunderbolt fa len at his f.et. the shock cou'd not have been greater, he was decrived of the power of his simits, and like a narble era ue he stood, gaz ng directly into the little clout.

Twas some minutes before he recovered, when starting back, be ejaculated-

"Did I not put them there? I am sure of it, and yet they are gone? Great God! I had deemthem so safe-I am lost! I am lost!" And he strode up and down the room, cursing his luck and beating his breast furiously. "Why was I so silly, so footish, as to preserve them? Would to all the fiends I had destroyed them when I had them !"

Again that low, mosting laugh seemed echoing in his car.

Now, they have gone forth, proofs of my guilt-but, hold! it may not be so desperate. have no proofs that any living man has them ; a lucky thought !"

Pompey, the negro, was here some few days might he not, in his ramb'ing and rearching, have hit upon this panel, and seeing the clothes, retained them for himself, una ware that the dark stains upon them was blood ! If so, and I have little doubt of it, he will be pronounc the murderer. Twill be easy for me, if he is aptures' and brought up, to say he stole the clothes from me, and then his running away will make it more plau ible. Things are not so desperate, after alt," and the guilty man bueying braself up with fa'ss argum ats, aused in his wet, while a smile of satisfaction s'o e over his features. "Fortune has not yet de

Once ib to that hollow, jeering laugh, and with it now bended a groan, deep and unearthly. Quiverleg with mortal fear, Bradford turned toward the door. He made an effort to rush through it, but was unable to do so; his limbs refused to support him, and he sank weak and faint upon the floor, his eyes still upon the door-

A tall majest'e figure, with the long night. hued cleak, stalked noiselessly in, its face was hidden but plain, distinct, and with awful meaning, came the wo ds-"Nelson Bradford prepare ! your doom is sealed. But a short time is granted you repeat or not, as you choose, for your enormous crimes. Ask pardon of the God you have off nded! Before the judgment bar of hie throne you will answer for your sins."

"Remember, the guilty never go unpunished! Even now the gates of hell are yawning to receive you, even now, Satan and his band await to drag you to everlasting death! Though you deem yourself secure, since your deed is not known to men, if is known to the Omnipotent Father of the universe. Tois is the last time I come to

Again the wretched man thought be heard that repulsive laugh. The figure grew dim and shadowy in the gloom be oad, and at length entirely dis pressed.

Summaning all his strength, Bradford ar se to his feet, seized the lanters, and flet cown the old stair: ass, through the echolog hall and lonely courty ard, and stopped not until he was in the soli u e of his own chamber.

Could the articles of that room have been en dowed with rife and speech for a time, what tales of crime, and the workings of a guitty conscience, could they tell they had witnessed; but the murderer felt safe within its precincts. He fastened the door with trembling hands, and then, throwing himself in an arm chair, covered his countenance, which was wet with large drops of perspiration, with his hand.

"Thank God, I need never go there again!" Strange, that one so deeply stained, should call up n the Creator he had rejected, to grant him aid.

"My last visit has been made to the hauntel house. Was it but the phantasy of a disordered brain, that combre form, that warning? "Though your died may not be known to man..." Yes, I remember those words, and if I pass through life unsu pected, what need I care for the here after? The last time I shall be tormented by the appearance, phantasy, or whatever it is! Then away with these foolish fears. The deeds were better known to spirits than to men-they are more apt to keep series.

I must evertome this rid culous fashion I have of being frightened at everything. The spectre at tile Second are. has never yet seriously injured me, yet, when it appears, I shudder and shiver, at what? Only the shade of one, who I know lies deep in the grants, with the cold sol heaped upon his breast." But though the tongue could talk, the body would not so in acquissonce, for his limbs still frambled with excess of excitement.

exertion wearies me, and my eyes look haggard and my checks are not so full as is their word.
Strely my health is not feding me. I do not feel ill, only excessively fatigued. My heart leape, as I think of what will transpire within the next hour; the exquisi e pleasure of obtaining reverge, will wash out the remounter ing exempt, will we note the monorance of my early days. Ah, how richly he shall suffer for the bitterness of she past."

She remained in her room until she heard a light top at the door, which opened and showed the face of her maid, who stood grinning and bowing, saying that Mr. Bradford awaited.

Leaving the apartment, Julia proceeds groom joined her. Neither of them had any attendant. Passively, she submitted him to kiss her cheek and draw her arm wi hin his own, and they descended the stalrosse.

Within the pariors a small group were as-sembled, which consisted of Harry and the Col-oral, toth of whom had been invited, Lawyer Brown, at d several of the surroundir g reside loc'uding Mr. and Mrs. Remeen, Virginia, and Edward, with whom Julia had become casually acquainted, and who were precent as a mat'er of artesy. Siler ce prevalled, as the pair entered the room, and Julia's eyes rested for an instant on the lawyer's face, a perceptible twinkle in his eye assured her all was right. E Flowly they moved to the upper and of the apartments, where stood the aged village pas-tor, he who a short time age breathed a funeral sermon o'er the dead body of the murderer's vic-tim. They waited before him for the service to commence, while all helf heir breath to catch the low tones of the white haired disciple o Christ; a triumphant g'ow lit up Bradford's eye as he began. "A few momen's more!"

thought be. "A few moments more!" thought Julia. Solemply and distinctly, the paster read, until he came to the worde-"If any man present has cught to say why this craple should not be joined in the holy band of wedlock, let him no w speak, or f rever after hold his peace."

Clear and firmly, feil the sentence upon the ears of all- ' I forbid the banus!" And lawyer Brown stepped near to the pair. Bradford started as if shot, and turning, fronted the attorney. "S'ate your reasons for this act," said the aged man, as much as onished as the rest. Brown gave a low whistle, and an officer en tered the room, and pas ing to Branford's side, laid his hend upon his shoulder, thundering-"You are my prisoner !" "On what charge, sir?" said Bradford Indig-

"For the murder of George O anlife!" It would be useless to attempt to describe exactly the appearance of Bradford, as these appelling words reached his ears, a deathly has spread over his countenance, his limbs grow

A slight shrick fell upon his bewildered senses, restoring his activity; it proceeded from Julie, whose strength had given way at the ing; she had fainted. The Colonel caught her as she was falling, and bore her to one of the solar.

Again the color came back to Bradford's face and rallying he turned to the officer, exclain

S'r, explain! what means this interruption this accusal of an innocent man? Have you a warrant for this deed, sir ? if not, you will

The officer produced a paper signed by the chief magistrate of the village, it was a warrant for his arrest ! To be Continued.
